SÉGALA, THE HIGHLANDS OF THE LOT

In contrast to the arid Causses, the Ségala countryside is always green. In summer, the uplands of the Lot cast «a spell of shade and freshness», according to the novelist Pierre Benoît who loved to spend time there. The name «Ségala» is a reminder of the importance of the rye crop in former times. In the south, bordering on the Figeac area, the streams which flow into the river Célé have carved out deep, wooded valleys, separating the villages built high up along the hilltop roads. The traditional houses have very shallow pitched roofs covered with curved Roman-style tiles, with a distinctly Southern look. The oldest still have a wooden balcony, typical of the area, where the chestnut crop used to be dried in order to conserve the nuts for winter.
